"As an absolute question, I would reply, 'no.' Nursing is treating the actual or potential response to health problems; the nursing process of data collection and diagnosis must be completed before any decision is reached. Many medical problems, including chemicals, present as aberrant behaviors. Only for the most deliberate of antisocial behaviors would I consider bringing legal charges against a non-psychiatric patient." Elizabeth L. Gallagher, RNC, Psychiatric Nurse Supervisor, Norristown State Hospital, Norristown, Pennsylvania.

"I think it would depend upon the circumstance. In nursing, we generally accept a certain risk factor of being injured by a patient who is not responsible for their actions. If serious injury should occur under this circumstance, insurance and workman's compensation would certainly assist recovery. On the other hand, if a serious injury occurred due to a deliberate action by an angry, rational patient, I would certainly consider legal action." Judith K. Hedrick, RN, MSN, Enterostomal Therapist, St. Louis, Missouri.

"Yes I would, if the injury was significant, costly and/or permanent, and the individual did not offer to make restitution. I believe people should either take responsibility for their behavior, or be forced legally to do so. Unless the person was temporarily unable to control his or her behavior, being a patient does not change one's responsibilities toward others." Sylvia Novak, RN, MSN, Assistant Professor and Psychiatric Nursing Instructor, California State University, Chico, California.
